[問題V] Read the following passage and answer the questions that follow.

It was a blistering hot* day in summer. The track leading to “Atlantic City” (Wyoming) was dry and bumpy, and ( 1 ). In 1870, Atlantic City was a prosperous town, with several thousand inhabitants, mostly men. It was a strange place to find a town, mind you, hidden in a little gulch* in the middle of a wide scrub* desert. Atlantic City began life as a staging post on one of the transcontinental* trails, taken by emigrants* en route for California.

Soon however it became a roaring gold town, where people could make (or lose) their fortunes in a day. Few of them made a fortune; a few found enough gold to keep them happy, but many found nothing, or nothing much. Then, about seven years after the gold rush began, it finished. Suddenly, it seemed that there was no gold left in the ground. Most of the miners packed their tools, their pans, and their bags, and went off somewhere else, to try their luck again. There were no more emigrants either; as soon as the first transcontinental railroad had opened in 1869, the old emigrant trails had been completely abandoned. The hotels closed, the shops closed, the bars closed, the jail closed; and before long, Atlantic City was a (2)ghost town, uninhabited except by the occasional rancher* or hunter, and a few wandering coyotes.

I didn't expect to find much in Atlantic City. I knew that a few people lived there again now, some of the old houses had been restored, and others had been built. But I didn't expect much. We drove round a dusty bend, and there in front of us lay the town, a couple of dozen wooden buildings, some old, some new, and mostly pretty plain. ( 3 ) there was a fire-station; then, in the middle of the town, a wooden “saloon*”. A drink, I thought, something to drink at last. I stopped the car in a cloud of dust, and we walked up the steps and into the saloon.

Well if I'd wanted to do a bit of time-travelling, I couldn't have done much better; walking through that door was like walking back over a hundred years in time. Inside, the old Western saloon was still intact*, with its big long wooden bar, and enormous mirrors on the walls. Apart from the electric light, the juke box*, and the tables set for dinner, it was almost perfect. And there in the corner sat the prospector*, with his wife. If he'd been wearing a red gown, (4)I'd have taken him for Father Christmas, but he wasn't. This old-timer wasn't in Atlantic City to bring presents, but to find gold.

He said his name was Brad, and he'd been looking for gold in Atlantic City for some time now. Yes, he'd found a little gold — not enough to make him a millionaire, but enough to make him happy. When the Gold Rush ended in Atlantic City, he told me, it was not actually because there was no more gold, but because gold was too hard to find, or not valuable enough. Today, gold is a lot more valuable than it was a hundred years ago, and modern techniques allow people to find gold more easily. And that was why Brad and his wife were in Atlantic City, digging for gold. They were not the only ones, said Brad; quite a few of the “concessions*” are now being worked, and some old mines are being opened up again. In some places, mining for gold has become commercially profitable again; but in most cases, the miners, like Brad, are just amateurs.

No, Brad hadn't spent all his life digging in tunnels and panning in streams, to find a few ounces* of gold. ( 5 ), he was a retired businessman, looking for gold as a hobby, and a nice way to pass the time in a wild, lonely and beautiful part of North America. More than gold, no doubt, Brad was looking for a way of life, a dream of the past. If he had found no gold, he would not have been too worried. Few of today's amateur gold prospectors are there for the money; most are there for the fun, the (6)isolation, and the nostalgia*. The legend of the west will go on inspiring people for many many years.
